Established in 1980 by the Forrest family, the first oyster farming location at Barilla Bay was chosen for its water quality, total tidal water replacement, and proximity to the airport. At this time the first 'runs' for pacific oysters, and a small shed providing shelter from the elements were built. Supplies of young oysters caught on 1" x 1" sticks were transferred in from the Tamar River. Barilla Bay Tasmania set about developing new methods of cultivating oysters to further enhance the quality of their product, some of which are widely used today in Australian aquaculture farms. Barilla Bay has helped pioneer the production of a 'single seeded oyster', which in turn meant developing new techniques in growing oysters to maturity, finally changing the face of the oyster farm by removing the uncertainty of catching juvenile oysters on 'sticks' in the wild.

The next major stage of development for Barilla Bay Tasmania was the opening of an a la carte restaurant and shop (to replace the 'farm shop') in 2004. With views over the Barilla Bay Oyster Farm and the Coal Valley the establishment has carved a unique path for aqua-tourism in Tasmania.

Did You Know??

- Oysters can change sex. They are "protandrous hermaphrodites", which means that while they become sexually active as males (1 year) over the next two or three years, without changing appearance, they can change into females.
- It takes up to 3 years to produce a mature-tasting, full-size Oyster
- Pearls are an irritant, a grain of sand that the oyster could not flush from itself and instead coated and smoothed with nacre- Pacific pearls are always small, misshapen, and chalky and never match in lustre the pearls of the Silver- Lip oyster.
- Oysters have tops and bottoms, a left and a right, a foot and mouth, a heart and a beard.
- 12 oysters contains around 100 calories along with multiple vitamins and minerals including iron, calcium, and magnesium, VIT A, VIT B12 and VIT C. Just to name a few, so eat up!
